A school exchange

Students at Oak School used to buy new uniforms each year. This spring, the student council organized a uniform exchange. Families brought clean uniforms that were too small for their children. Volunteers sorted them by size rather than by school year. The first event was held in the library because rain made the playground unsuitable. Forty uniforms found new owners. The council plans another exchange before the next school term and will ask families to wash items before bringing them.

A lost umbrella system

The station used to keep all lost umbrellas in one large box. Finding a particular umbrella took a long time. A student volunteer suggested attaching a numbered tag and writing the color and date in a notebook. The staff tried this system for a month. They could answer questions more quickly, and fewer people had to wait. Owners still needed to describe their umbrellas before receiving them, so the numbers alone were not enough to claim an item.

Testing a poster

The sports club made a poster to attract new members. It showed photographs of strong players, but no information about beginner lessons. Only experienced students joined. The club then added a sentence saying that beginners were welcome and listed the practice times. More students came to the next meeting. The club kept the original photographs because they showed what members could achieve, but made sure the poster also answered new students' practical questions.

A different competition

A science club held a competition to build paper bridges. At first, teams thought the widest bridge would be the strongest. The rules required each bridge to cross the same gap and use only two sheets of paper. A narrow bridge with folded sides held the greatest weight. Afterward, the teams compared their designs and explained what they would change next time. The teacher gave a prize for the clearest explanation as well as for the strongest bridge.
